

GARRISON, MISC.

The concealed engagements between Lieutenant McSween and Major Hickman could not have continued indefinitely without an ultimate daylight confrontation. Soon enough the day arrived.

The catalyst for this long overdue encounter came in the form of Brigadier General Elton J. Maxwell, the Assistant Division Commander. It was he whose personal jeep had been briefly graced by Lieutenant McSween, with Alexander sitting upon his lap.

As his driver halted the jeep on the main road in front of the 577th bachelor officers' quarters, the general stepped out of it. He was a meticulous man and even his heavy overcoat ~~has~~ been well tailored. The silver star on each shoulder gleamed brightly in the sun. The corporal rounded the jeep and came to join him.

"Are you sure it was right here," asked the General, "that the lieutenant came out and took over my jeep?"

"It was either here or that next barracks over there. The only thing I'm positive about was that he was wearing snakeskin boots."

"Snakeskin boots," commented the General. "In thirty years of service I've never heard of snakeskin boots."

"And he was carrying that big dog."

"In thirty years of service I've never heard of a lieutenant with a dog. Lieutenants do not have dogs in this man's Army."

"General, I think this is sort of a different kind of lieutenant."

"So I gather," replied the General dryly.

An ambulance pulled up to a stop behind the jeep. Major Hickman, having departed the hospital in cold fury without waiting to be discharged and without waiting for his jeep, climbed down from the front seat. His stomach still pained him from the last horse needle injection and the right side of his chest was still tender from the orderly who had helped throw him down. His mouth was a thin, hard line across the bottom of his face but he managed the semblance of a smile as he approached the General and saluted.

"You've been to the hospital, Major?" asked the General.

Hickmann shrugged as casually as possible. "Just a routine check, sir." The last thing in the world he wanted, while he sweated out his chance to take over the battalion, was to have word about the recent heart attack scare bouncing around the Division.

"We have a small problem here, Major." said the General. "Do you happen to have a lieutenant in your battalion who wears snakeskin boots?"
